Donald Trump will go down in history as the proverbial mad bull loosed upon the American political establishment's china shop to leave ruin and devastation in his wake.

Whether he wins the presidential election 2016 or not, Mr. Trump has accomplished something that could not have been probably accomplished any other way: he has shaken both American political parties in ways never seen before, and he has bluntly articulated the inner thoughts of tens of millions of Americans, ignored by "mainstream" politicians, without a shred of the now all-conquering, mandatory dialect of political correctness.

Taking center stage by storm, Hurricane Donald has kicked mainstream media in the teeth and survived without sweat; has used language that strikes the fear of God in the hearts and minds of professional politicians on both sides of the aisle; and is blasting a path to the nomination by proving the monster polling industry wrong at every turn of the road (which has led to general mobilization of pollsters seeking to prove he is already finished—for example, see here and here).

Evidence of Mr. Trump's blistering success as a master spoiler and a take-no-prisoners "rabble rouser," as the liberal press wants it, comes in huge bursts.

There isn't a "respected" pundit, claiming five-star progressive credentials in the land, for example, who hasn't pulled all stops in tearing into the Trump campaign with the most derisive attacks on both the man and those who saturate every venue he chooses for his campaign rallies.

Still, even life-long liberal commentators reluctantly admit, Mr. Trump has no difficulty controlling the news and creating what the news needs to say with minimum interference from the omnipresent “editorial review” and the behind-the-scenes media moguls and their political friends.

In the battle against “Trumpism,” old time prestigious marques like The New York Times and the Washington Post have reached all the way to bottom of their trick footlockers to find and deploy every last reserve of underhanded vitriol, combined with an unstoppable cascade of open and unprecedented insults, in order to torpedo the New York mogul’s campaign.

The traditional faithful, Adolf Hitler and Benito Mussolini, have been yet again resurrected to remind us that Mr. Trump is, truly, a reincarnated combination of both. And the Republican Party, aghast at the utter failure of the party leadership’s flyweight “approved” nominees, is staging an unprecedented campaign to stop the one candidate who can win the party’s nomination hands down, an effort which makes many Republican voters uncomfortable and, thus, divorced from the choices of the party patricians.

The Trump barrage profoundly upsets policies the American establishment considers etched in stone. The establishment sees such constants as non-negotiable since they form the cornerstone of a post-WWII world model defined by the United States—a foundation worth fighting and dying for.

But, Donald Trump declares, this foundation needs an urgent, radical overhaul that will make it unrecognizable in order to “Make America Great Again.” The resonance of this Trump message is so strong that international organizations are already scurrying to preempt a possible Trump presidency fearing the emergence of an uber non-politically correct US paradigm beginning January 2017. And, already, “10 foreign policy experts,” all establishment figures, have rushed to tell us why Mr. Trump could destroy America with his choices.

So, is Mr. Trump the destroyer-in-waiting or is he not?

If there is one thing certain among the piling uncertainties surrounding Hurricane Donald is that he is determined to bring a future presidency straight into uncharted waters without much care about what is etched in stone or what the establishment sensitivities, preferences, and cushy cooperative relationships define as prim and proper (if, that is, he succeeds in continuing to stun and hurry the immovable political satrapies and the Washington bedrock political institutions).

This is the reason why Mr. Trump causes establishment politicians, who are committed “to staying the course,” to lose sleep. Keeping America on its present bearing that many find corrosive and dangerous Mr. Trump has declared dead and buried.

The Hurricane’s crude language, his unhesitant, aggressive blasting of “legitimate protest” at his rallies, and his more than obvious contempt for the “Washington bureaucracy still running on floppy disks,” has invigorated voters long considered lost, in their despair about their present and future, and absent from the polls.

Such is the liberal left wing’s urge to declare “Trumpism” extinct that it took one bad week in the Trump campaign to trigger a veritable deluge of analyses why “Trump is self-destructing” (for example, see here, here, and here).

Such furor is the best proof of how established political baronies and the media are petrified at the mere thought of such a grand, disrespectful, insulting “spoiler” arriving at the White House and why he must be stopped at all costs.

History, it is often said, is written not by peoples, as traditional left-wing exegeses assert, but, rather, by inimitable leadership personalities, iconoclasts with the inner conviction they can smash the idols and introduce a new religion to the masses.

Historians continue to argue whether to vote or not for an Alexander the Great, Napoleon, Lenin, or Hitler, while the world unavoidably has to live with the results of these men’s successes and failures.

Thus, today’s rabble rouser, uncouth, anti-equality, racist, bigoted, foul-mouthed, anti-woman, anti-minority, Beelzebub Trump could well be the reformer, pathfinder, and logjam demolisher for historians to argue about one hundred years from now.

As much as such a future possibility causes severe indigestion to those who have methodically tied American society down with lethal social, political, economic, “equality,” and “affirmative action” shackles, Mr. Trump, victorious or not, has already caused part of the liberal Barad-dûr walls to collapse.

His legacy alone may be the real game changer—and as the liberal routine taunt to the world goes: “Get a life... and live with it.”
