

CALL FOR PAPERS

The next issue of the Journal of Mediterranean and Balkan Intelligence will focus on the topic of “Intelligence and Terrorism”.

The topic of the next issue of the Journal of Mediterranean and Balkan Intelligence is “Intelligence and Terrorism” and aims to highlight the challenges that the intelligence community is facing in combating terrorism. This special issue aims to publish cutting-edge and contemporary research articles in relation to the areas of policing, intelligence and terrorism studies. National, regional and international perspectives that address practical and theoretical issues regarding the role of intelligence in combating terrorism are welcome. Terrorism in its various forms has been one of the greatest security challenges. The cases of Al Qaeda and ISIS, but also domestic terrorist threats and cases of cyber-terrorism, reveal the difficulty in confronting such a complex phenomenon. Terrorism has challenged the organisational culture of the intelligence community in many ways. In a world where enemies are little understood, means of attack are unpredictable and potential targets are many, diverse and changing, intelligence agencies need to adjust rapidly. Shifting the focus from traditional interstate conflict to that of terrorism, producing actionable intelligence and striking a balance between privacy and security, are enormous tasks for any security and intelligence service.

The next issue of the JMBI aims to provide a needed perspective on the challenges of intelligence in combating terrorism and calls for papers that address among others, the role of intelligence in counter-terrorism, law enforcement intelligence, CBRNE and counterterrorism, the need for intelligence sharing, the importance of all-source fusion and approaches in confronting cyber-terrorism.
